Bio

"Music can be perspicacious if it is resonating through you. The dancing and movement is a mystery to me." - Mixing only records which evoke that deep feeling that makes him want to loose control, Tiari (A.K.A Trevor Caruso) tells a viscious tech-house story with his moody selections and dance tracks that give you no choice but to move your body to the rhythm. Born in metro Detroit he was heavily influenced by electronic music his entire life. At 6 years old he learned breakdancing from the combined influence of his mother and older brother who was a big fan of hip-hop music. He has always been a fan of underground and punk culture. A part of the local electronic music/dance scene since 1995, he began to mix 2 years later. Tiari has, within the last few years, become dissatisfied with the monotony in the local scene, and decided to get serious. And serious is what he has become; with minimal tunes and deep tracks that will give the squarest of lads no choice but to lace up their dancing kicks and get down. Berlin has welcomed him this year (2008) for his talents. This second trip to europe to rock out has given him international recognition. His productions are the result of 9 years of experimentation, utilizing what little equipment he could afford. Schooled on a couple drum machines and a sampler, Trevor Caruso developed his style with whatever toys, keyboards, or various other gadgets he could strap to his early 80's Schwinn Tornado (Custom tiger-striped seating) and haul home from his local neighborhood garage sale. The funk surpassed his technical know how and has produced that raw vibe of tech house madness that is sure to move the masses.
